Wednesday night a furious gale, with thunder, lightning and rain, that came up just at meeting time, prevented us from going to the court-house, and the service was intermitted. All day yesterday the gloomy weather continued, but towards evening the darkling skies relaxed their frowning appearance; the sun set in a crimson haze of indescribable beauty; we went cheerily to our appointment by our romantic path through the pines; met a fair congregation; had a good meeting; and as we came home by the railroad track, the stars were out again. This morning the weather is just glorious. I don't know a contrast so great, in any other place, as that between fair and foul weather by the seaside. The ocean, chameleon-like, takes on the hue of the skies; and this double gloom -above and below-tremendously enhances the doleful outlook. But the rule works both ways; and, surely, no morning is so brightly beautiful as that which breaks where the glad ocean reflects the blue sky; and more than doubles the exquisite charm of either. We look out from the upper verandah of our hotel upon the beautiful expanse, to see the sailing vessels creeping along the distant line, where sea and blue ether meet; "some to the east some to the west;" but in nature that never sleep. Yes, that's all, as if strung upon an invisible wire, true, and they won't let anybody else sleep and were being slowly moved across the either—that is, I have been told so. First, the stately, long-leaved pines, of which one no more grows weary than of the murmur of the surf. Then the fresh green undergrowth, like well set shrubbery just now, and one particular bush, with young leaves, deep red, as they first come out, giving the effect of something in bloom, scattered thickly through the jungle. Rex, our superb white and tan pointer, and a "natural pacer," goes bounding before us, taking patronizing care of the party; making frequent forays into the brush, as he hears a lizzard rustling the leaves, or a bird flitting among the low branches; dashing back into the pathway far ahead and casting a retrospective glance of wonder and reproach at us for lingering so much. Then finding we are making some progress, however slow, he paces majestically on, till a fresh disturbance in the undergrowth excites him into another dash of discovery. Judge Owsley has gotten to be one of the most rantankerous of prohibitionists, but he has not lost his head entirely yet. The Lancaster News quotes him

"The prohibition party is disposed to carry things to extremes; being backed by women who know nothing about legislation or organic laws. This accompanied, in many instances, by a disposition to have laws enacted granting suffrage to women, has greatly retarded the good results which they, originally, had in view. The opposite party in their greed for gain, are seeking to establish , special privileges without regard to public good. We, as democrats, should stand by what we regard as a proper construction of the Constitution and enforcement of the laws, realizing that no party can successfully maintain itself on one single idea.'

Another Fable.

Once upon a time there was a goodly creature of the female equine persuasion who dwelt in in a pasture near the publie highway; and she was extremely jealous of all who came near the inclosure with a bridle, or even a string. But when anything, man or beast, approach- SEVENTY FIVE DOLLARS THE SEASON. ed, or passed by, bearing a saddle, she backed her ears and took so furious a spasm of kicking as to suggest to a goat MAMBRINO STARTLE, near by that unkind remark: "She knows what a sore-back is." She was very proud of the achievements of all the line from which she had sprung and upon the slightest occasion, and in fact made occasion to regale heradmiring associates with distinguishing traits of excellence peculiar to her equine family. Upon one occasion the sarcastic goat was heard to remark: "She would have us think they what a sore-back is." She was very remark: "She would have us think they are all 'hosses,' but I have always heard kicking ability ascribed to another family." Now an idle wandering hunter one day took upon himself to go gunning for game, and being somewhat deficient in eyesight, was unable to descern anything smaller than an elephant, ventured near the sacred inclosure where browsed the amiable and handsome, but high-kicking equine, with his game-sack in view, day took upon himself to go gunning for which was mistaken for a saddle, and the hunter would doubtless have been kicked to death, as possibly he deserved, had not the handsome equine been so eager to display the extensiveness of her heels in the paroxysm that followed, that her head was not brought in for its part in exercising judgment and direction, and the heels struck wide of the intended mark, while possibly they may have done mischief to some one or more who had been fortunate enough to receive kindness from the family of "hosses," to which the hunter was a stranger. And while kicking may be a high art, it fails to advertise the head."

SPECIAL NOTICE. SPECIAL NOTICE.

In offering the services of this highly bred young stallion to the public I feel assured that those having first-class mares will appreciate him, not only as a trotter himself, but as a horse whose breeding ranks him among the foremost in the land.

As the public is well informed, at a 4-year-old he started in several closely contested races, proving conclusively in each case that he is a game, reliable level, beaded race horse. At latonia he start. ble, level-headed race horse. At Latonia he started against Jack Huyden, Ossie B. and others, winning easily in three straight heats; time, 226, 227.9. At Maysvine, Ky, with Eagle Birds a competitor, what was apparently a dead heat, was trotted in the remarkably fast time of 221.

13 His stud service is limited to 40 approvemance.
